Saul Ewing has added as a partner in its Los Angeles office a trial attorney with a nearly 30-year track record of representing public and private companies, along with executives and investors in entertainment and real estate disputes.

The law firm said Thursday that Stephen Ma brings experience representing music publishers in licensing and copyright cases along with real estate developers and lenders in litigation involving breach of contract and fraudulent transfer claims.

Ma also has extensive experience representing individual officers, directors, investors and others involved in securities investigations by the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission and other authorities. In addition, he's worked on cases involving claims of mortgage securitization fraud, insider trading and illegal kickbacks; securities class actions, and derivative litigation.

Ma also serves as outside general counsel to clients that include companies involved in land banking, film projects and other media ventures.

Ma has a law degree from Northwestern University Pritzker School of Law and a bachelor's degree from Georgetown University.

"Steve is a trusted advisor to clients and a strategic litigator who is well-connected in the Los Angeles legal community," said Los Angeles office managing partner Steven Ziven in a statement. "He truly enhances both the depth and bench strength of our firm's California commercial litigation practice."
